By Ricky Savage, the voice of social irresponsibility

Here comes summer

Here we go again, a chance to swelter in the heat, watch ice creams melt, drink overheated beer and eat charred bits of dead animal in the garden while we watch yet another great British sporting collapse. This year we've got football, tennis, cricket and more bloody cricket - all sports where England's finest can embarrass themselves.

Let's start with the football. This time it's the European Championships and seeing as some bright spark has decided that boy Keegan's bunch of misfits should play Germany in Belgium we all know what's going to happen. Look at the history, when we take on the Germans they win, usually on penalties, so stick your money on the Krauts now, stock up on Euro-lager and start drinking to forget the humiliation.

Tennis means Wimbledon, means strawberries and cream and champagne and embarrassingly early departures for our hopeless bunch. Last time an Englishman won the men's title at Wimbledon was more than 60 years ago so fat chance of Tiny Timmy Henman changing that!

Cricket is the next dead loss sport, especially now that our 'boys' are rated the worst in the world. Alright, so it might be down to back-handers, but Zimbabwe should be able to flatten the English and the less said about the inevitable 'blackwash' when Brian Lara and company arrive for a bit of batting and bowling practice the better. Our only hope is that some bent bookie pays the opposition to lose, but the way England's excuse for a cricket team play not even that will work.

Not, of course that summer is all bad. There is the Euro-lager to drown out the football, cheap champagne to take away the pain of Wimbledon; Pimms to wash away the bitter taste of cricketing defeat. There's also the chance of redemption through rain where cricket and tennis are concerned. But victory? Fat chance, this is England after all and the only people with the right idea are the head-bangers at the BBC. They did the sensible thing in May by cancelling the torture that is Grandstand because they didn't have any half-decent sport to show. What gets me is why they don't cancel it every week to save us the humiliation of watching England's finest lose at tiddlywinks.

So, the only way to get through the summer without embarrassment is to start drinking to forget and look forward to August and the return of the Premiership. At least that's a domestic competition and can't be won by foreigners, except, of course for Chelsea who have enough of them to turn Italian into the lingua franca of the dressing room.

EAST FINCHLEY FAMILIES

The Killingbacks and Jarvises

By Daphne Chamberlain

Joan Killingback's father used to send her rabbits through the post. "The parcels were long and well-wrapped, so you knew what was inside. This was before the war, and they got here from Huntingdonshire on the same day."

Fortunately, Mrs Killingback was the wife and daughter-in-law of butchers.

Her father-in-law, Maurice Killingback, came to London in 1900, from the Essex village of Steeple Bumstead. He worked for a butcher in Long Lane, before opening his own pork butcher's shop in a building attached to the Post Office sorting office. That area, of course, was once the Hog Market, and he could still buy pigs in Prospect Place.

High on the hog

Later, the Killingbacks opened another shop in Market Place and, after World War II, one in Church Lane, which was run by a manager.

Joan's husband, Arthur, looked after both shops. On Saturdays in the 1940s, he often cycled down to Essex to buy stock, sending it here by train. Once, he came back with a lorry-load of onions. "They went like wildfire, because you just couldn't buy anything then."

Nearer home, Arthur bought goats which grazed in the cemetery, off Strawberry Vale.

"You wouldn't believe what I've had in my garden," says Joan. "There was one particularly vicious goose, which we tied to the apple tree. Mind you, it didn't stay there long."

It probably had its revenge, because plucking birds is hard work. It gave her finger-ache until she got into the rhythm.

Christmas service

Speaking of work, she says, "We never had Christmas without someone knocking on the door to pick up something they'd forgotten."

Joan Jarvis as she was originally was born in 1920, in The Grange. (Not the present estate, but a large house on Oak Lane, otherwise known as Simms factory, and later CAV.) Her father was the caretaker, and her mother ran a small canteen selling tea and cakes, in a garden where the Health Clinic stands today.

Arthur Killingback, who closed the Church Lane shop in 1969, died some years ago, but Joan still lives in Chambers Gardens with the youngest of their five children (also called Arthur). "I don't get out enough to hear much gossip nowadays", she says. But that doesn't prevent her taking a lively interest in Finchley old and new.
